9) What are the different business organization structures that an accountant may use? What are the advantages of these structures?

Answer: Accountants may establish a sole proprietorship, a partnership, a limited liability partnership, or a limited liability corporation. The latter two structures are permitted only in certain provinces, based upon provincial legislation.

Advantages:

A sole proprietorship is the only choice if there is only one PA. It is a simple business structure.

A partnership is used to allocate income to all partners and helps ensure that all partners are responsible for the actions of the organization.

A limited liability partnership (or limited liability corporation) is used to limit liability to only those partners who worked on or supervised a particular engagement. This helps protect the personal assets of partners.

22) A) Outline the reasons why provincial CPA organizations conduct practice inspections.

- B) How often are these CPA practice inspections done?
- C) What are the implications of these CPA practice inspections?

Answer: A) The provincial CPA organizations conduct practice inspections for two reasons:

- to protect the public interest by ensuring that public accountants are adhering to professional standards set out in the CPA Canada Handbook—Assurance; and
- to help public accountants improve their professional standards. These inspections, which are mandatory for CPAs in public practice, involve reviewing quality control processes as well as individual audit and/or review engagement files.

B) Practice inspections are normally completed every three years; they can be done annually if the inspectors conclude that the practice unit does not maintain adequate practice standards. In addition to the practice inspections, the CPAB conducts annual inspections for audit firms that have 100 or more reporting issuers. There are 14 firms that fall into this category—all of the Big Four plus 10 other firms. CPAB also inspects, at least every two years, firms with between 50 and 99 reporting issuer audits. Over three years, the majority of the 163 Canadian audit firms registered with CPAB are inspected. Many of the foreign firms are subject to oversight by other audit regulators. These firms are inspected periodically based on CPAB's risk analysis.

C) The provincial practice inspection committee can impose sanctions. These include reinspection the following year and referral to the provincial association's professional conduct committee, which can require the member to take courses, remove the practice unit's right to train students, expel the member from the professional body, and withdraw the member's right to use the "Chartered Professional Accountant" (CPA) designation.
