Business ethics can be approached from two distinct perspectives: descriptive and normative. The descriptive perspective is a summation of the customs, attitudes, and rules that are observed within a business. It simply documents what is happening in a business. 102. What function does an organization's code of ethics perform?

A code of ethics serves a dual function. As a message to an organization's stakeholders, the code should represent a clear corporate commitment to the highest standards of ethical behavior. As an internal document, the code should represent a clear guide to managers and employees for making the decisions they face every day. A good code of ethics should be structured to liberate and empower people to make more effective decisions with greater confidence.

Several major changes have taken place in the business environment over the last five decades. The increased presence of an employee voice has made individual employees feel more comfortable speaking out against actions of their employers that they feel to be irresponsible or unethical. They are also more willing to seek legal resolution for such issues as unsafe working conditions, harassment, discrimination, and invasion of privacy. The issue of corporate social responsibility has advanced from an abstract debate to a core performance-assessment issue with clearly established legal liabilities. Corporate ethics has moved from the domain of legal and human resource departments into the organizational mainstream with the appointment of corporate ethics officers with clear mandates. Codes of ethics have matured from cosmetic public relations documents into performance measurement documents that an increasing number of organizations are now committing to share with all their stakeholders. The 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act has introduced greater accountability for chief executive officers and boards of directors in signing off on the financial performance records of the organizations they represent.

104. What are the three principles available to resolve an ethical dilemma? Are they always successful?

Three resolution principles are available to resolve an ethical dilemma:

Ends-based principle considers which decision would provide the greatest good for the greatest number of people.

Rules-based principle considers what would happen if everyone made the same decision as one would.

The Golden Rule considers doing unto others as one would have them do unto him or her.

None of these principles can be said to offer a perfect solution or resolution to a problem since the reactions of other people involved in the scenario cannot be predicted.

Four commonly held rationalizations, identified by Saul Gellerman, can lead to misconduct:

A belief that an activity is within reasonable ethical and legal limits—that is, that it is not "really" illegal or immoral.

A belief that an activity is in a particular individual's or his or her corporation's best interests—that an individual would somehow be expected to undertake the activity.

A belief that an activity is safe because it will never be found out or publicized—the classic crime-and-punishment issue of discovery.

A belief that because an activity helps a company, the company will condone it and even protect the person who engages in it.
